SLEEPING IN VACANT HOUSES.
Device of a Man Who Was Unable to Pay for Lodging.
Washington Post.
"I have come to the conclusion that the really deserving do not appeal for help," said a well-known real estate and renting agent, "and I reached this conclusion by catching up with a fellow who was working a game on me in order to get a place to sleep at night. The man had called at the office of one of five times and asked for the keys of such and such a house, saying that he would look through and return the keys next day. He always returned them promptly, saying that the house did not exactly suit. The fellow was always decently dressed, and had every indication of being a thorough gentleman and a gentleman, and I did not hesitate to let him have the keys whenever he called for them. One morning I had been called from home at an early hour by the illness of one of my married daughters, and in passing a house to which the supposed house-hunter had the keys, I saw him coming out, and it was not yet daylight, either. I stopped him, and there and questioned him, and he told me that he would call at my office and make an explanation. At 8:30, when I came to my office, he was on hand, and with tears in his eyes he told me that he had been sleeping in vacant houses for more than a month; that he was out of work, and without money; that he knew his wife and three children were square thing to do, but that he was forced to find a place to sleep, as he could not get any more, and a gentleman, and I did not like the man's frankness and honesty, and he showed me letters which convinced me that he was a "bird of passage." I interested myself in his behalf, and succeeded in getting him a paying position with a good firm. He never comes around this way without dropping in to thank me, but he says he is still in up until he has a good bank account. This fellow is a gentleman, and will come to the front, even if he did sleep in vacant houses."
